Prepared: July 2026

1. Organization Overview

The Tropical Institute of Community Health and Development (TICH) is a premier institution committed to empowering individuals, families, and communities through transformative education, research, and skills development. Established in 1998, TICH has pioneered training in community health and development, fostering leaders equipped to address health and livelihood challenges.

TICH's mission extends beyond education, emphasizing collaborative partnerships and research to inform policies and programs that benefit society's most disadvantaged. Their work combines practical training with strategic leadership to develop solutions addressing health disparities, poverty, and community resilience.

Vision

A healthy, just, prosperous and sustainable society in which individuals, families and communities are enabled, empowered and equipped with the necessary practical capacities to enjoy essential elements of dignified livelihoods and experience life in its fullness, while being prepared to respond to crises that occur from time to time in life.

Mission

Building on and strengthening the potentials, actions, strengths and capacities of individuals, families, communities and institutions in order to develop concerned and effective leadership and programs in community health and skills development through academic and professional training, research and partnership at all levels — Building a bridge into a sustainable and secure future beyond the 21st century.

Goal

To develop and sustain TICH as a research and tertiary center of academic, professional and technical excellence providing support and facilitation in community health, medical, education, and vocational science and technologies skills development.
